Protect Construction from OSHA's One-Size-Fits-All Heat Rule

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration's (OSHA) is trying to arbitrarily adopt a one-size-fits-all national heat standard that's triggered when the heat index exceeds 80°F as part of its new Heat Safety Rule.

Using a one-size-fits-all heat standard creates impractical requirements and leaves employers vulnerable to citations and penalties.

Your help is needed- tell OSHA its final rule must recognize regional differences in climate and account for workers' behavior and individual health conditions that could put construction employers at increased risk.

WHAT TO DO: It takes less than 45 seconds to send this prewritten message telling the White House, OSHA, and Congress to ensure flexibility with the final rule.
